Oh Never! Bronx 'Dolls Up' On East Side and Returns That Rented 'Dress Suit'!

Of Course, Something Had to Happen, so the Clothes Were Returned to Wrong Place and Gussie Had to Appear in Court.

When the Bronx comes to the east side to get all dolled up for the evening's festivities, it is somewhat unusual. And when the Bronx returns the fancy clothes, not to the owner, but to another party, it is not only unusual, but also alarming.

Every once in so often all of us have to put on the iron shirt, the how tie, carefully laid in place by friend wife or mother, and the tight fitting black trousers. Many of us also look in vain for the suspenders which the thoughtful Aunt Sarah sent in a pink and rose box nine years ago Christmas, and in default of those accessories, which in all probability now adorn the back of some Belgian or Serbian refugee, confiscate the trouser hangers of little Willie for the evening, much to his consternation when he awakes in the cold gray dawn of our morning after.

But he that as it may, John Henry of the Bronx decided to appear with all possible honors. He invested a nickel in the Interborough and journeyed to Livingston Street, where one can obtain everything from an oven-grown pickle to a parlor set—all in ten minutes and at the lowest possible rental or cost, as the case may be.

"Nice suitings," declared the proprietor of the store, Rose Frazer. "You said something," agreed the prospective Beau Brummel of the Bronx.

With the suitings, pantings and vesting there went a nice bow tie, a regulation Tammany hat and a plug hat which would tempt the most religious youngster at the time of the first snowfall of winter. The "large chaplain," as Private Hinks, A. E. F., would have it, was simply irresistible.

The defendant-to-be hired the dress suit and carried away all possible honors at the social event of which he was a participant. There was no evidence in this connection, but when he appeared before Judge Ringle in Essex Market Court yesterday, one had only to use his imagination to conjecture the list of blue ribbons and pink damasks which fell to his lot.

The ball being a matter of history, the next morning the society man at once negotiated for the return of the borrowed dress suit and sent his sister to the east side with it.

But, unfortunately, the numerals became mixed, as numerals often do, and instead of returning the regalia to No. 155 Livingston Street, the dress suit was placed in the window of No. 155 by the messenger. All of which was eminently pleasing to the acquirer, but most annoying to the renter of the costume.

With a swell ball coming next Tuesday, and no suit for the guest of honor, there was a perplexing dilemma. Things had come to a pretty pass, when one who rented a dress suit wore it in the daytime and for several nights following—and all for the price of one evening's splurge. Those were the sentiments of the owner of the suit, when it failed to reappear.

So the good offices of Judge Ringle were asked and the borrower came into court. Also came the dress suit, iron-clad shirt and plug hat. And also came several illuminations concerning the traffic in evening suitings and pantings.

"How much is the suit worth?" the complainant was asked.

"Thirty-five bucks it cost."

"How much is the rental?"

"The first time I got $5, the next $4 and the next $3."

"I suppose that after that it rented for less."

"Certainly not. We got $6 and $7 if we can."

And so it happened that Gussie, who owned the wrong store at the wrong address on Livingston Street, was asked to bring forth the ballroom attire. Gussie refused, unless at the command of the judge.

When Judge Ringle asked about the clothes, there appeared first in Essex Market Court a dress coat, after the approved styles of London before the war; then a pair of panties appeared on the horizon, followed by a bullet-proof shirt and a once immaculate dress tie, now slightly battle-worn, and a delightful plug. As these articles seemed to appear from nowhere, the spectators gazed in rapt attention.

"I'll bet a rabbit is coming next," hazarded one.

But only this and nothing more was the verdict, as the complete uniform appeared on the table.

Judge Ringle decided that the dress clothes should be returned to their original home.

And now the ball of the Hollyhock Social Club, which takes place in the near future, will go on without a break, for the guest of honor will be the chief constable in the town of Wilton, Me., at the annual constable's ball, in flawless evening costume.

Somebody has pinched Patricia. That is all there is to it, and William J. Belms, fingerprint man at Essex Market Court, is on the warpath.

A boy, two weeks ago, as Mr. Belms was on his way to court in the speedy Third Avenue L, he felt something biting his ankle. Or so it seemed. In a moment Patricia, the aristocratic mascot-to-be of Essex Market Court, was in his lap. And an hour later Patricia was comfortably installed in the court, with all the privileges of a Magistrate and with all the favors that would be awarded to Gen. Each if he suddenly appeared before the

CHARTER OF LABOR UNION IN ATLANTIC CITY REVOKED

Federation Says It Failed to Return Money Collected From Firms for "Entertainment."

ATLANTIC CITY, April 11.—The Executive Committee of the American Federation of Labor has revoked the charter of the Central Labor Union, which embraces every federated labor organization in this city.

The reason for this action, according to Frank Morrison, Secretary of the American Federation of Labor, is the "persistent violation" by the local body of instructions from national headquarters for the return of money, estimated at several thousand dollars, collected from firms and corporations throughout the country for the "entertainment" of the annual convention of the American Federation here in June.

British Honor F. S. Medical Men. LONDON, April 11.—Five members of the American Army Medical Corps were decorated with the Military Cross by King George at Buckingham Palace yesterday. The men honored were Capt. Paul Preston, C. Sallett, J. Dooling and W. House, and Lieut.
